If you have dcc32 or idapropro you can decompile arm assembly code. A: Most of the proprietary (and some free) assembler/linkers include an option to insert debugging information (such as symbol name, offset of addresses, etc.). The linker to be used with this options must be given with a special command-line switch. Such an assembler/linker could be used to examine the source code. In 2007 I had the experience of designing a state-of-the-art two story horizontal expansion for a client that was a leader in its industry, but had seen its market size shrink considerably in the early 2000s. The multi-use expansion was designed to handle the current load, but that load was diminishing. The owners were concerned about the future of the project and we were challenged with a problem of diminishing scope that had to be solved before the project was built. My solution was to introduce the concept of Rethinking Schemes and expand the ground floor in one large wing. This approach allowed the project to be built before market conditions changed and resulted in a building that was self-supporting, minimizing the need for future maintenance. Good news, the Bankruptcy Court has decided to go for an October sale of the property, which is about 90% complete at this point. The motivation behind this sale is twofold: to give the developer time to bring the project into good financial shape, and to get out of the way of the possibility of a short sale. If the sale does not go through, I expect the developer will do a short sale with the intentions to raise the money to finish the project. At that point, I can't imagine the financing would be available. A Phase 1 elevation for this project was recently completed and the initial renderings are posted on the website.

We are currently in the design phase of the Office and Interchange project. The project is designed to serve three separate tenants, each with different needs: a small independent accountant; a large firm focusing on accountancy and audit needs; and a small firm specializing in personal services for the affluent. All three are within 2 miles of each other, which allows the company to avoid the need for new space and provide for growth. We are currently in the pre-construction phase and have not established a timeline. Due to the myriad of factors affecting this project, we are working as efficiently as possible. A friend of
